20/8/26 Reflection

Topic: Writing a markdown Reflection

Today, I learned how to write a Markdown reflective document where I will keep my reflections on class topics and also how to organize the information in the document.

Key Points

A reflection document should have a simple format that makes it easy for the person who is reading to understand the content covered in class.

- Title/Heading – Topic/class date should be stated clearly.
- Topics Covered – The main concepts discussed in class should be included.
- Explanation – Concepts need to be explained instead of just topics.
- Personal Reflection – Write what you understood or learned in class.

Writing & Formatting

Additionally, we realized that a proper Markdown reflection must be clear, precise, and legible.

- Structure your work using headings and subheadings.
- Ensure that related points are grouped together.
- Use bullets or numbered lists whenever necessary.
- Don't repeat yourself where it's not required.
- Make sure that you maintain consistency in the formatting across the whole document.

- Ensure that you write as much as is necessary, but not too much.

Summary

The key learning from this class is that a reflection isn't just a checklist of the topics covered. It must provide a brief explanation of what has been covered, what has been understood, and what has been learned in Markdown form.
